This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE SOCIAL MUSEUM

AS AN

INSTRUMENT OF UNIVERSITY TEACHING[1]

UNIVERSITY teaching is being rapidly revolutionized by new applications of the inductive method. The scientific habit of mind, trained to observe and to generalize from observation, has long been applied to the facts of nature, and museums of zoölogy, botany, anatomy and chemistry have been recognized as indispensable prerequisites of university instruction. Lectures on science, however suggestive they may be, are not of the essence of education in science. Not the ear, but the eye, is the primary organ of scientific knowledge; and next to the eye, the hand. To interpret nature one must, first of all, see, touch, scrutinize, and analyze. The laboratory, the dissecting-table, the clinic, the microscope, the museum, are the instruments of sound learning. The schoolmaster of Do-the-Boys Hall in "Nicholas Nickleby" was a monster of vulgar brutality, but in a degree of which Dickens himself was perhaps not aware, Mr. Squeers was a prophet of scientific education. "C-l-e-a-n," he said, "clean, to make bright, to scour; w-i-n-d-e-r, winder, a casement. When the boy knows this out of book, he goes and does it." Is not this familiar method of the naturalist equally available for the sciences which concern themselves with human history and conduct? May not the phenomena of social evolution, like those of physical evolution, be inductively approached? Is not the chief hindrance of social progress to be found in the failure to apply to the facts and movements of society the method of science, as though emotion and sentimentalism could be substitutes for accurate observation and prudent generalization?

[1] Reprinted from the Internationale Wochenschrift, Berlin, Nov. 23, 1907.

Should not, therefore, the museums of natural science be supplemented by similar collections designed to promote the study of the social sciences?

This transition in education may be illustrated by the development of Harvard University during the last fifty years. The Museum of Comparative Zoölogy was founded in 1859, and in connection with this museum were soon organized further collections and laboratories, of paleontology, botany, mineralogy, and geology. In 1866 was added the Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology, which now forms the anthropological section of the University Museum. In 1889 the inductive method was applied in a new direction by the endowment of the Semitic Museum, illustrating the history of Palestine, Assyria, Egypt and allied races; and the instruction of the University in the manners, customs, religions, and philosophies of these types of civilization has been stimulated and refreshed by this presentation of suggestive facts to the student's eye. A further step was taken in 1902 by the establishment, in large part through the princely gifts of the German Emperor, together with generous contributions from the King of Saxony, the Government of Switzerland, and a committee of scholars, artists and men of affairs in Berlin, of the Germanic Museum. This unique collection of models and reproductions sets before the visitor in a most impressive manner the story of German art and architecture from the fifth to the eighteenth century. The student of history finds himself confronted by the statue of Henry II from Bamberg, of Maximilian from Innsbruck, of the Great Elector from Berlin, and of Frederick the Great from Stettin; the student of religious art inspects with his teacher the bronze gates of Hildesheim, the golden gate of Freiberg, and the tomb of St. Sebald's at Nuremberg. What effect these graphical illustrations are likely to have on the vitality and attractiveness of Germanic studies may be readily conceived. The dignity and continuity of German art are perhaps nowhere more effectively exhibited, and many American students learn, for the first time, in the Germanic Museum the scope and refinement of German culture. Finally, in this series of collections, was begun in 1903 the Social Museum, to promote investigations of modern social conditions, and to direct the amelioration of industrial and social life. Such a museum is undertaken on the assumption that the most immediate need of students concerned with the social question is, not merely enthusiasm or sympathy or self-sacrifice or money, but wisdom, discretion, the scientific interpretation and comparison of facts; and that this application of the inductive method may be encouraged by setting before the student in graphical illustrations the evidences of progress in various countries and putting at his command the fund of experience accumulated in various parts of the world.

The remoteness of the United States from other countries and the brevity of its social history make this provision of illustrative material all the more necessary. Problems of the social order, which elsewhere represent gradual processes of social evolution, have presented themselves in the United States with startling abruptness and in dimensions of portentous magnitude, and put a sudden strain on political and social wisdom. The growth of the great cities, with its consequences of congested population, unsanitary dwellings, intermittent employment, and peril for childhood, is so modern a phenomenon that the principles of municipal government and municipal poor-relief have not unreasonably failed to keep pace with the new demands. The flood of a million immigrants a year, sweeping into the seaboard cities, and drawn from the most part from nationalities unfamiliar with the principles of democracy, threatens to overwhelm the traditions and ideals of the earlier stock. The collisions of labor with capital, of the white race with the blacks in the South, and of Orientals with Occidentals in the West, raise new questions both of self-preservation and of justice. These and many other social problems have in large measure taken Americans by surprise, and the science of society cannot safely proceed without new observation, comparison and appropriation of the experience of the world. The same demand for comparative sociology is laid, in various degrees, on other countries. Germany has much to teach the United States of municipal administration, but may learn much from America concerning the free conciliation of labor-disputes, or the science of improved dwellings. England offers to Americans instruction in trade-unionism and industrial coöperation, but must turn to the United States for lessons in the reform of the drink-traffic and the checking of the drink-habit. For all such purposes of comparative study the Social Museum provides what a museum of comparative zoölogy offers to the naturalist, and becomes the corrective of hasty judgments and the prerequisite of judicious conclusions.

Many notable institutions in various countries have been established to promote social welfare by this exhibition of comparative results. The Exposition of Welfare Work (Ständige Ausstellung für Arbeiterwohlfahrt), at Charlottenburg, is an impressive collection, indicating to employers and employed the possible gains, both in industrial production and human welfare, of improved devices for security and health; and it has had many, though as yet modest, imitations in Germany, Holland and Austria. The Musée Social in Paris is a noble monument of private munificence, maintaining an admirable library of reference, and promoting conferences and researches of high importance. The Central Bureau for Welfare-Work in Berlin (Centralstelle für Arbeiterwohlfahrtseinrichtungen), and similar enterprises in Frankfort (Institut für Gemeinwohl, Soziales Museum), in Hanover (Hauptverein für Volkswohlfahrt), in Amsterdam (Central Bureau voor sociale Adviezen), in Stockholm (Centralförbundet för socialt arbete), and elsewhere, offer information concerning social experiments, give legal advice to wage-earners, or collect material for observation and research.[1] The Institute of Social Service in New York and its associate, the British Institute of Social Science in London, undertake to collect all manner of facts bearing on human progress, so that the experience of all countries and individuals may be available for the guidance of each. None of these collections, however, though admirable in its scope and intention, is directly associated with academic life, or primarily concerned with the instruction of students in a university. The Harvard Social Museum is, it is believed, the first attempt to collect the social experience of the world as material for university teaching, and to provide guidance for academic inquirers into the study of social progress.

This Museum offers for the present hardly more than an outline of its complete intention, but it is already possible to appreciate the expansion of academic research which it represents. A student, for example, proposes an inquiry into the various schemes now advocated, both in Great Britain and the United States, for the insurance of wage-earners, of which the German plan is the monumental example. He turns for assistance to the Social Museum, and finds there, through the munificent generosity of the German Government, and the courtesy of the Commissioner at the St. Louis Exposition, the exhibit made at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of the Imperial Insurance System, consisting of one hundred and nine diagrams and statistical charts, together with a complete collection of reports and documents; to which by the generous coöperation of private corporations are added special exhibits from Bochum, Halle, Saarbrücken, Hanover and other German towns. It does not follow from this provision of material for study that the American student will find himself committed to a similar scheme under the different conditions of American life, but it must greatly fortify his social courage to see in pictorial and statistical representation the wonderful expansion of this administrative service in Germany, and the multiplication of institutions for the prevention and relief of disease which have been the consequences of this vast scheme of Imperial responsibility. A second student undertakes a special research in the problem, now gravely felt in the United States, of the systematic correction of mendicancy and vagrancy, and he finds in the Social Museum a collection of photographs, charts, and documents illustrating the labor colonies of Germany, Holland and Belgium, and is led to compare the various systems of detention, discipline and maintenance which have been approved by these countries as adequate to cope with the tramp-question. Still another student concerns himself with the problem of improved housing which, more than any other form of social amelioration, commends itself to the business instincts of American citizens. He examines the various types of this new science, in which it is proposed that wise philanthropy shall coincide with reasonable commercial returns, and the Social Museum provides him with pictorial evidence, not only of successful enterprises in American cities, but of the best schemes of city-blocks and rural housing in Great Britain, France, Germany, Holland, Belgium and Switzerland. The settlement-system, already represented graphically by eighty-seven examples, the coöperative-system, the French Institutions Patronales and Syndicats Ouvriers; the German crusade against tuberculosis; the provision in various countries for the insane and defectives, — these and many other subjects of special inquiry lie before the student in the Social Museum, as though he were himself a traveller through many lands, observing the material which contributes to an inductive study of society. Incomplete as the present collection is, and fluid as it must always be under the rapidly changing circumstances and needs of social life, it at least brings the world near to the student and the student near to the world. Academic research is held close to facts, and social experiments are tested by experience.

Two impressions must force themselves upon any thoughtful mind as it examines such an exhibit of social activity. In the first place, it is an evidence of the scope and comprehensiveness of this modern movement of social service. Different types of modern civilization must, it becomes plain, follow different roads of progress; but by converging paths, and often without consciousness of concurrent action, the procession of social reform is marching across the history of the present time toward a common end of social justice and peace. The student in one country is surprised to discover that his problem has been recognised and its solution attempted in many lands and under many conditions, and is fortified in his own endeavor by the sense of companionship and sympathy. Problems which appear baffling or insoluble when regarded as marks of an exceptional or local crisis may be approached with patience and hope when seen as aspects of a process of social evolution in which all countries have their share. It is the same accession of patience which the naturalist feels when he turns from his own limited inquiry to the great collections of a Museum of Comparative Zoölogy, and finds that the limited range of facts which he has been observing fall into their place within a universal plan.

In the second place, the student of the Social Museum is inevitably led to appreciate more distinctly the character of the social movement in which he has his share. These varied and world-wide provisions for the less fortunate, the poor, the sick, the defectives, the aged, and the unemployed; this sense of social obligation, expressed at one point by governmental action and at another by individual initiative; these enterprises of housing, sanitation, temperance, insurance, and recreation; this readjustment of industry either by legislation or by voluntary coöperation, the shorter working day, the protection of women and children, the recognition of the employed as partners of employers; — all these and many other types of modern social science, though they may assume the form of economic arrangements, and must for their efficiency conform to economic laws, disclose to one who surveys them as a whole, in the unity of a museum, the working of a social motive quite distinguishable from the desire for industrial advantage or the hope of economic gain. They are the evidences of a developing sense of social obligation, the expressions of a social conscience, urging action quite beyond the necessities of economic progress toward an end of social justice, brotherhood and peace. In a word, the social question, seen in the mirror of a social museum, reveals its essential character as an ethical question. It is a picture of many men in many lands trying in many ways and with various degrees of success to make a better world. It is not an accident that the Social Museum of Harvard University is established in the building dedicated to philosophy. The facts collected in such a museum are dead material until touched to life by the interpretative power of philosophy. They are data of social ethics which verify the faith of ethical idealists.
